

Sometimes, these cells stop aging while they are teenagers and remain in this young state in your brain even when you are an adult.

They seem to help the health of your brain and also can quickly grow into adult cells if they die during an injury.

But for now, they haven't completely chosen what they are going to be yet.

